Government has made few friends in the Russian-speaking world by the way it has pursued its policy of "countermirrorism" in the international arena. It has been, and is, more than a little eager to "work with" dictators and other foreign opponents of human rights and democratic standards, to apply the concept of counterinsurgency to counter the resistance to corruption, freedom of information, or even the populist tendencies of national leaders. This sort of approach is reflected in the Reagan-era "just say no" attitude of the State Department to such evils as Salvadorian death squads or Guatemalan guerrillas. But it has now spread, and reached its most in-your-face form in the tough stance of its new assistant secretary of state for democracy, democracy, and human rights, J. Christian Adams. His book, "How to Talk to a Civil Rights Attorney: The First and Last Battle," is an absurd read which proves that it is not just the far right in the US that is hell-bent on going to war in Latin America. Adams has not mellowed much, if at all, since the Iran-Contra scandal of the 1980s (where he was the chief aide to Vice President Bush). The book is filled with some of the ugliest names in US government dealings with Latin American dictators and others of the "anti-communist" elite. The short answer to this is that with the so-called democratic revolutions in places such as Panama, Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala in the late '80s, the administration suddenly finds itself in a position where it needs to flex its "muscles," and "do something" about the popular movements that have swept these countries away from the clutches of their long-standing authoritarian rulers. Adams wants to show that the road to democracy really is paved with good intentions, only to be sabotaged by the barbarians who might not appreciate (or probably won't understand) the system they have won. The tactic is simple: you start by irritating the people you claim to be "working with," you draw the communists close to them by making secret treaties, and you march in, guns blazing. f678ea9f9e
